Market & Portfolio Developments

Market Review

November saw a strong rebound from October's low. Global equities rose by 7.81% on expectations that US inflation has peaked, paving the way for less aggressive rate hikes, alongside the easing of COVID restrictions in China, which previously weighed on economic activity. Within a short span of a month, markets went from pessimism to exuberance.

Main Contributors 'What did well?'

On the back of favorable sentiments surrounding the relaxation of COVID restrictions in China, Emerging Markets and China 'A' equities contributed positively to performance. In US, Small-cap equities contributed favorably as investors anticipate slowing rate hikes on softer inflation. They highlight the advantage we have in investing in opportunities that may not appear favorable with markets but have the potential to perform well when markets rebound.

Main Detractors 'What underperformed?'

Amid a sea of green, Healthcare equities posted modest returns, in line with their more defensive nature. That said, they still delivered good returns, similar to those of the S&P 500.

Market Outlook

Most investors would have been encouraged by the recent market rise, with some anticipating a turnaround in market mood following a long period of market volatility and pain. While investors rejoice, they should refrain from prematurely calling for an all-clear going forward since volatility is likely to persist as interest rates rise. Long-term investors can expect the market to rise over time and can use volatility to their advantage by accumulating units at attractive valuations.
